

The Scene

In the nation and the world

Spies. Just like the family album

The very devious aren't so different from you and me. The CIA sends its satellite pictures to Kodak to be developed and printed. The similarity ends there, though. The CIA work is done in its own secret lab at the Rochester plant, and the finished 8-by-10 color glossy photos with circles and arrows on the back are sent to the National Photographic Interpretation Center, a windowless building at the Washington Navy Yard. CIA headquarters never sees the pictures. All it gets are the interpretations.
